Injured Worker, Though Not Working, May Not Be Entitled to Compensation

A worker who is injured on the job is entitled to weekly compensation for his injury if he is prevented from performing his work as result of the injury. But if the worker is not injured in the job and is prevented from performing his work for some other reason, he may not be entitled to compensation, even if he is prevented from performing the work that he was doing for his employer.

1. The injured worker is not allowed to perform his work because of an injury.
2. The injured worker is not allowed to perform his work because of a disability unrelated to his work.
3. The injured worker is not allowed to perform his work because of a disability that is unrelated to his work but is related to a condition that is unrelated to his work.
4. The injured worker is not allowed to perform his work because of a disability that is unrelated to his work but is related to a condition that is related to his work.

Sylvania Strike Fund

For the past sixteen (16) weeks a strike has been on in the Sylvania Corporation. Local 114, IUE-AFL-CIO, is involved in this strike. The company has not attempted to negotiate with the union and is therefore not performing its duties under the contract.

The company is in negotiations with Local 114, in an attempt to settle the dispute. The negotiations have been going on for several months, but to date there has been no agreement.

The strike is still continuing, and the company has not agreed to make any concessions. The union is determined to get back to work and to have its rights restored.

Salaried Workers Are Worried

In the November-December issue of the G.E. Product News, salaried employees shared some concern about the future of their jobs. The company has announced that it will no longer honor its four-year contract with salaried employees.

One salaried employee claimed that many employees are worried that their future is uncertain. The employee suggested that the company's decision to end the contract may have been made to avoid higher labor costs and to maintain a competitive advantage over other companies.

Local 114 has been negotiating with the company for several months to try to reach an agreement. The union is concerned about the impact of the company's decision on its members and is determined to fight for their rights.

Workers Under 65 and Disabled Face Serious Social Security Problems

When the law was passed a decade of years ago making it possible for a disabled worker, who reached the age of 65, to apply for Social Security benefits, it was hoped that disabled workers would be going to get some much-needed relief from insecurity. Now that the law has been put into effect, however, reports show that near disabled workers are not getting the money for which they strive and finding that they are only able to support by a pension even lower than the Social Security benefit. This is a very serious problem for disabled workers and one which the Social Security Board, while it has been working on the problem, has yet to find a solution.

Unemployed

The meeting ended at the 10:00 a.m. session with the announcement that the National Council of the Social Security Board, acting under authority of the law, had decided to extend the unemployed benefits for an additional three weeks.

The meeting adjourned at 11:00 a.m.

Output and Jobs

It is estimated that there are now over 1 million people in the United States who are unemployed. This figure includes both those who are actively seeking work and those who have given up looking because they believe there is no work available. The situation is particularly acute in the manufacturing sector, where unemployment rates are well above the national average. However, there are also significant numbers of unemployed in the service sector and in agriculture.

When Business Gets Into Politics

Corruption Has Been the Pattern

WASHINGTON (PAI)—Rich, powerful corporate businesses, in their desire to protect and promote their interests, have a long history of engaging in political corruption. In this editorial, we explore the patterns and examples of political corruption that have characterized the business world for decades.

A recent study by the Center for Public Integrity found that the top 100 corporate donors to political campaigns in the United States spent a total of $2.1 billion on campaign contributions in the 2020 election cycle. Of this amount, $1.4 billion went to candidates who went on to win the election, representing a return on investment of 100% for the donors.

The study also found that the largest corporate donors were disproportionately concentrated in industries that had benefited from government policies, such as energy, healthcare, and finance. This suggests that political corruption may be fueled by the expectation of future benefits from government actions.

An Example of Cynicism

By John Holmgren

The following excerpt was published in the Washington Daily News on...

...In this article, we see a glimpse of the corrupting influence of big money in politics. The author describes how the wealthy and powerful use their resources to influence political outcomes, often at the expense of the public interest.

Big Money for Politics

One of the intriguing aspects of the contemporary political landscape is the influence of money on the political process. The role of money in politics is a complex issue, involving questions of democracy, transparency, and accountability.

In the current political environment, large corporations and wealthy individuals have become increasingly active in the political arena, employing tactics such as campaign contributions, lobbying, and issue advocacy to influence policy outcomes. This has raised concerns about the potential for political corruption and the erosion of democratic values.

The Role of Corporate Influence

Corporations and wealthy individuals have long been a force in American politics, using their resources to influence policy outcomes and shape public opinion. The role of money in politics has become a matter of intense debate in recent years, with many calling for increased transparency and accountability in the political process.

The Impact on Political Outcomes

The influence of big money in politics can have significant consequences for political outcomes. Campaign contributions can provide financial support to candidates and political parties, allowing them to run more effective campaigns and gain a stronger foothold in the political arena.

The Future of Money in Politics

The role of money in politics is likely to remain a central issue in American politics for the foreseeable future. As the political landscape evolves, it will be important to continue exploring the ways in which money influences political outcomes and the impact of this influence on democracy and the public interest.
