Strike Resumed at Boston Globe

Despite animosity of the GE workers, the Herald Tribune staff was back on strike by noon on May 14 after GE leased the strike equipment company it had locked out on April 22.

The employees first walked out on April 22, after the GE workers were locked out in an attempt to prevent the Herald from publishing. The GE workers had been working for three weeks on the strike, and the Herald Tribune staff had been working for two weeks. The strike ended after the Herald Tribune staff demanded that the GE workers be paid the same as their counterparts at the Herald Tribune. The GE workers agreed to these terms and the strike was called off.

Shop Stewards Discuss Real Reasons Why GE Refuses to Grant Pay Raises

The shop stewards discussed the reasons why GE has refused to grant raises to its employees. They argued that the company is not following the same pattern as its competitors, who have been granting raises to their employees. The stewards also pointed out that the company's profits have increased significantly in recent years, and that the company's management has not shared these gains with its employees.
