Westinghouse Strike Settlement Approved, Brings 18 Cent Raise and Union Security

The United Electrical Workers of America have reached agreement in principle with the Westinghouse Electric Corporation to settle a long-running labor dispute. Under the terms of the agreement, the company has agreed to increase wages by 18 cents, and to establish union security provisions that will strengthen workers' rights.

The settlement follows months of negotiations between the union and the company. The union has reported that the agreement will improve working conditions and benefit workers' families. The new wage increase is expected to provide a significant boost to workers' incomes.

Westinghouse workers have been on strike since early last year, seeking higher wages and better working conditions. The company has been fighting the union's demands, arguing that it could not afford the cost of the proposed increases.

The settlement is a victory for the United Electrical Workers of America, which has been at the forefront of the struggle for worker rights. The union has been able to secure a significant wage increase and strong union security provisions, which will help to ensure that workers' rights are respected.
