Raising Needed for Everyone’s Good, Not GE Increased Productivity Drive

The way to workers to achieve their own living conditions and stop the country from another depression is to work together. But the General Electric Company wants to believe the solution is “increased productivity.” There are a few reasons the GE statements are wrong.

In the past, workers have gotten into a false prestige for their increased productivity. The hero’s share going to the executives. As a result, many have been increased expenses and higher middle-grade salaries.

From 1930 to 1947, the wage increases in the electric utilities industry have been kept up and profits have soared. Workers have had no benefit from this.

In 1930, there were more than 20,000 men of workers who in 1937 did little or nothing to stop the ship the country into another depression. The depression caused many workers to lose their jobs. Workers did not want to see this.

Workers have been taught by their bosses in the past that they are not interested in their future. They are not interested in the country’s future. The workers have been taught that the company’s future is more important than their own.
