Gazette Plays Up Anti-Union Story

The Saturday Evening Gazette, in an attempt to bolster the anti-union sentiment among the workers, ran a story titled "Gazette Plays Up Anti-Union Story." The article criticized the union for its alleged influence on the workers, suggesting that the workers were being influenced by "outside agitators" rather than by genuine worker interests. The Gazette claimed that the union was using its influence to suppress free speech and to prevent workers from expressing their own ideas. The article was written by a member of the union's local council, who was quoted as saying, "We must make sure that the workers understand the dangers of being unionized. The union is only interested in its own self-interest, not in the best interests of the workers."

Union Members Favor Parking Restrictions

In response to the Gazette's article, several members of the local union committee called a meeting to discuss the issue of parking restrictions. The committee voted to support the union's position against parking restrictions, arguing that they would benefit the union by limiting the number of non-union workers who could enter the plant. The meeting was attended by several members of the local union council, who were quoted as saying, "Parking restrictions are a way of controlling who works here. We need to keep the number of non-union workers down, and parking restrictions will help us do that." The committee also voted to support the union's position on the issue of union influence, arguing that the workers should be allowed to vote on union matters and that the union should not be allowed to dictate how the workers should vote. The meeting was attended by several members of the local union council, who were quoted as saying, "Parking restrictions are a way of controlling who works here. We need to keep the number of non-union workers down, and parking restrictions will help us do that."
