Union Flays Callous N. Y. Unemployment Practices

The Union has moved on two fronts to end what it terms "punitive practices" by the New York State Unemployment Insurance Division. It is using both the courts and the legislature to bring about greateropportunity in the field of unemployment insurance.

About 240 unemployed, many of whom have been out of work for months, have been issued "no work found" notices by the division.

In effect, the notices declared the workers to be "unemployable" and ordered them to be kept off the rolls.

State Law: Workers Who Can Find Jobs Must Go To Court

The division's action has led to a series of court actions in which the union has been involved. In one case, the union has asked the court to order the division to take back an affirmative action against a worker who had been denied unemployment benefits.

The union has also been active in the legislature, seeking to pass a law that would require the division to prove that a worker is fit for work before it can be denied unemployment benefits.
