Wausau Lockout Solid
Entering Ninth Month

The International Textile Workers in Wausau, Wis., entered the ninth month this week with the men and women in the picket line still strong in their determination not to let the company achieve its objective of breaking the union.

Organizationally, the Textile workers have not been gathering strength consistently. They now publish a weekly, printed newspaper which takes their story to the community.

As a result of the local agreement reached at the headquarters of the United Textile Workers of America in New York, the Wausau lockout has been extended to three months. The company has been ordered to cease all production.

The lockout was called in December of last year, following a strike over wages, which resulted in the Wausau Textile Works being forced to close its doors.

The lockout has been called in various parts of the country as a result of the agreement reached at the headquarters of the United Textile Workers of America.
