UE Will Avoid New Labor Board As Unfair; Steelworkers Adopt Same Policy on NLRB

The national UE will soon consider the new National Labor Relations Board set up by the Taft-Hartley law. The General Executive Board of UE has adopted an issue to avoid it to the new NLRB. Similar actions were taken by the United Steelworkers of America and several other CIO unions.

The Taft-Hartley law, known as the NLRB or NLRB, is an attempt to enforce the Taft-Hartley Act of 1947. The act was intended to combat the influence of communist sympathizers in labor unions and to prevent them from taking part in collective bargaining. The law also included provisions for the appointment of a new labor board, the NLRB, which would replace the National Labor Relations Board established by the Wagner Act of 1935.

Enforcing Contract Is Vital to Union

The Taft-Hartley Act is a vitally important tool to protect workers' rights. It is used to ensure that contracts are honored and that employers comply with the terms of the agreement. The act also provides for the enforcement of anti-discrimination laws and the protection of workers from unfair labor practices.

Taft-Hartley Law Speaks in Depression

Because of the passage of the Taft-Hartley law, the forces leading for a depression are vastly strengthened. Boss unions, US Washington representatives, points this out in his weekly news analysis.

"The ability of the people to make ends meet, already weakened by renewed losses and general inflation, will be further reduced by the Taft-Hartley law. The law will place a heavy burden on the already weakened economy. It will also make it more difficult for workers to organize and bargain for better conditions."}

Interesting Angles On Anti-Union Law

Information about the effects of the Taft-Hartley Act on the union movement was brought back from the meeting of the UE Conference Board of UE by the UE representatives.

"Although the law has been widely condemned, it is not yet clear how effective it will be in deterring union activity. The law's provisions for the appointment of a new labor board, the NLRB, and the enforcement of anti-discrimination laws are seen as important defenses against union activity.
