Injured Workers Do Not Lose Compensation Protection When Case Is Closed

In the past, some of the cases of injured workers who suffered compensable injuries have been closed, the judge in the case has ordered the worker to return to work, and the workers who have been injured in the process of getting back to work have been given the impression that they no longer have any compensation protection. This is not the case. Injured workers who are members of the United Steelworkers of America, are entitled to compensation protection even after they have returned to work. This is because the union has the right to appeal the judge's order and to reopen the case if necessary.
