Thousands Delay Filing Jobless Claims
White Hall Work, State Study Shows

A new study of benefit claims shows that unemployment insurance is a secondary concern to those unemployed seeking new work. According to the study, conducted by the Bureau of Labor Statistics, 35 percent of the 1,343,000 jobless workers in the state were not filing for unemployment benefits at the time of the study. The study also found that the average delay in filing was slightly more than three weeks.

The study did not compare reasons for filing, an earlier study showed that thirty-one percent delayed because they were employed in a new job within a short time, Mr. Linus said.

The other large group of workers who did not file immediately were those who were not eligible for benefits because they were unemployed in the first place, the study showed. About 27 percent of the workers were not eligible for the benefits because they had 40 or fewer weeks of covered employment, the study showed.

Benefits Under Corridor or Comprehensive Plans Questioned

The U.S. National Directory of Pension, Health, and Welfare Department, Joseph Smith, has been questioning the General Electric Company about the Comprehensive Plans. Some Americans think Comprehensive Plans, which are voluntary programs designed to cover a wide range of benefits, are underpaid in some cases because they do not pay enough for the services provided. The General Electric Company is owned by the Corporation, and its income comes from the activities of other companies.

A new study in New York, published by the Boston University, shows that a number of people have been denied jobless claims when they applied for them. The study also showed that the number of people who applied for jobless claims has dropped by 25 million in recent years.

Accidents Must Be Proved to Win Compensation Benefits

In order to get compensation benefits (medical treatment or weekly handouts) an injured worker must prove that he had an accident arising out of his employment. In most instances proving an accident is relatively easy. Where the accident is clearly a result of an unlawful act of the employer, the Company is likely to challenge the fact that an accident took place.

In other words, the Company is required to prove whether an accident did occur or not. Generally speaking, the Company must prove that:

1. The injured worker was not guilty of misconduct when he was injured.
2. That the accident occurred while the worker was engaged in the plant.
3. That the accident occurred while the worker was performing his job.
4. That the accident was caused by an act of the employer.

The second type of challenge is whether the incident can be concluded to be an accident. Generally speaking, an example is whether a worker accidentally trips and falls during his work and injures himself. The answer to this question should depend on the facts and circumstances of the case.

Let us now see an example of each of these challenges to the resolution of such accidents:

The first challenge: the employer must show that the accident was a result of an act of the employer. If, for example, a worker is injured because he was not wearing protective clothing, the employer must show that he was required to wear protective clothing and that he was not wearing it at the time of the accident.

The second challenge: the employer must show that the accident occurred in the plant. If, for example, a worker is injured because he was not wearing protective clothing, the employer must show that he was required to wear protective clothing and that he was not wearing it at the time of the accident.

The third challenge: the employer must show that the accident was caused by an act of the employer. If, for example, a worker is injured because he was not wearing protective clothing, the employer must show that he was required to wear protective clothing and that he was not wearing it at the time of the accident.

Let's Avoid Trouble, Says Jim Carey

"...that if we do our job well, the membership and an informed public opinion is going to prevail. And we will see that unemployment insurance is maintained for all Oregon workers and all other workers." Approximately 1000 members of the Local 270 Local 270 rally behind President Carey when he referred to the five important issues affecting Employment Security. A collection committee will be set up from the members on each of the five plants so they can be addressed. Carey said that these five issues constitute the rank of our negotiations in 1980. They are:

1. Coverage: Sexuality
2. No Precaution during Last of Work
3. Protection during Liquids with Supplemental Unemployment Benefits
4. Lower Pay for the Exchange of Service
5. Elimination of All Discriminators

Major victories in the current negotiations by Victor J. Montcalm who is negotiating for the United Electrical Workers have been notable. A statement delivered to the membership that the United Electrical Workers should be recognized in the United States.
