The Nativity of the Union

The story of how the United Electrical Workers of America (UE) was founded.

The General Electric Company had just completed a new plant in Schenectady, New York. The company was looking for a way to reduce costs and increase efficiency. They decided to build a new plant, which would be used to produce electrical equipment.

The building was completed and the new workers began to arrive. The company quickly realized that they needed to hire more people to work in the new plant.

The company decided to use the sweatshop labor of the UE workers to keep costs down.

The UE workers were paid less than the minimum wage, but they were willing to work for less because they knew the company was using them to lower their costs.

The UE workers were also given terrible working conditions. They were forced to work long hours in a dirty and unsafe environment.

The UE workers decided to strike against the company.

The company quickly realized that it was losing money and agreed to negotiate with the UE workers to end the strike.

The UE workers were able to negotiate better wages and working conditions.

The UE workers were able to win a better life for themselves and their families.

The UE workers were able to set an example for others who were suffering under similar conditions.

The UE workers were able to show that it was possible to organize and negotiate successfully.

The UE workers were able to prove that they were not just workers, but also human beings with the right to a better life.
