Tangible Backing By the State Employees

STATE WORKERS JOINED THE POCKET LINES Monday morning when they have been working a week since the expiration of their collective bargaining agreement with the State. Organized strike action was taken by the State Employees Industrial Association (SEIA) of the United Federation of Teachers (UFT).

The SEIA, which represents the State's 60,000 civil employees, said it was forced to take action because of the state's failure to honor its obligations under the collective bargaining agreement.

The strike was called after negotiations between the state and the SEIA broke down last week. The state had offered to increase wages and provide better working conditions, but the SEIA refused to accept the offer.

The state government has been criticized for its handling of the strike, which has caused widespread disruption. The state has been forced to close schools and pension offices, and some state employees have been forced to work without pay.

The SEIA, which represents teachers, school administrators, and other state employees, said it would continue to negotiate with the state in an attempt to resolve the dispute.

Contributions Still Come

Vincent O'Brien, President of the Brooklyn Labor Council, and others have contributed to the strike fund. On the first day of the strike, workers in the Electrical Union News were asked to contribute to the fund to help support the union members. The fund has been growing steadily, and more contributions are expected to come in.
