Is Rivalry Worth It?

There has been a lot of talk recently about the worth of Rivalry. In one of the supposed purposes of Rivalry is to create a spirit of friendliness between the freshmen and the sophomore classes, why doesn’t it do this instead of producing friction and causing pettiness and spitefulness? The University should ideally be made up of Rivalry, in which one of its supposed purposes is to create a spirit of friendliness between the freshmen and the sophomore classes.

We don’t think that Rivalry should be abolished in its entirety, or even curtailed in any way, but we think that it could very definitely be improved. For one thing, the athletic events could be scheduled closer together than at present, but still leave enough time for practice and participation in several events. When they are spaced so far apart as they have been with practices and competitions already set and when the fault of the faculty leadership, administrators tends to be the cause of the improved schedule, for the freshmen could perhaps maintain until the end of the athletic events, instead of being discouraged, or quartered, or vengeful at these events.

We have all heard it, and at the beginning of the Rivalry period, everyone is enthusiastic and ready when the right time arrives. But the first few days, what is that? Nothing. The freshmen maintain the proper spirit longer than do the upperclassmen. Could this year’s Myskania try to improve Rivalry?

As an example, how many freshmen wore the Rivalry flag last Saturday? Exact figures are lacking, but they far outnumbered the sophomores. Rivalry probably does bring out some class rivalry; those freshmen who are sincere and conscientious soon assume a leading position they are entitled to. This is a very good thing.

The shortening of the beanie-wearing period was great, because the shorter it is, the more enthusiasm is maintained during this time. But even at the end of this short period, the freshmen “forgot” it. We can’t even imagine how students neglect the Rivalry activities.

This year we noticed that some of the penalties imposed for the flag have been missing. The flag itself has been stolen regularly. For years we have been envious of the beautiful flag and have wanted to own one. Now we see no beak of the flag, because freshmen have already been missing it.

We think that the most important thing that can be done is to make the Rivalry activities more interesting. Otherwise, the freshmen will be left out of the fun.

In conclusion, we hope that this year’s Myskania will try to improve Rivalry.
