On Capitol Hill: Reality vs. Principle

by Vivian Parson

The potential for stalemate is real and will not subside in Washington, the nation's capital and the ultimate home of all the political issues facing the country. The Senate and House have yet to reach a compromise on the budget, a crisis that threatens to bring the government to a halt.

Women's Studies Gains Academic Toehold

WASHINGTON, D.C. (CP) - Like the civil rights and black power movements before it, the women's liberation movement has brought demands for new curricula on a number of campuses. According to one observer, 60 colleges and universities now offer either one or more courses that can be taken by women. The call for women's studies has grown out of a feeling on the part of many women faculty members and students that they are being largely ignored by most of the candidates, disciplines, and for too much of the study of women being done by men.

"Women's studies is by academic standards or by those to be sensed as being still mass and find its way into the curricula of many other institutions," says John McLaughlin, an authority on women's studies. First the first full-fledged women's studies program, but organizers hope that the program will attract more women and men to enroll in courses, including those offered by the university's social science faculty, and a community center.

Organizers include "Women in Comparative Literature," "Women's Cause of Women," "Women's Center," and "Women's Rights Action. "

Like black studies, women's studies programs have faced serious problems in getting approval from the university's departments and faculties. One of the first women's studies courses to come at a University setting was at Stanford University, where a group of women and men formed a community center.

The city council is expected to vote on the plan this week.

The city has been dealing with snow issues for the past few weeks. The snow has been falling heavily, and the city has struggled to keep up. The mayor has called for a meeting with the council to discuss the situation.
