WOMEN DEBATERS UPHOLD NEGATIVE

In Its Debate

The impracticability of a system of compulsory unemployment insurance was the chief argument against which the finance committee of the student government met in a debate in the recent debate with Keuka college.

Audrey O'Bailey, '31, the first speaker for the affirmative, opened the debate by one of the questions, stating that a system such as this could not possibly be carried out in practice, neither could it prevent the recurrence of such a situation.

Miss O'Ready also stated that during such a time, any food would not last long giving out the specified sum of ten dollars a week to the seven million, as are now out of work. The insurance companies are not ready to assume the risk of operating such a class of insurance, she said.

The first speaker for the affirmative, Florence Lervin, '34, of Keuka, delved into the possible errors in the wording of the question. She said that the American system was attacked by the Federation of Labor, for it was against the laws and they would not be allowed by the United States. Miss O'Ready, '34, the second speaker for the affirmative, brought up the same points, leading to the conclusion that a system of insurance would involve state interference, which would lead to graft and the evil which she was afraid of.

Miss O'Ready stated that the need for a system of insurance to cover the working man had been working out for a long time. Florence Lervig, '34, of Keuka, described the situation now existing. Miss Stokes To Be Chairman
