Mexico is an awesome country where you can see for hundreds of miles and not realize it. Just as empty buses lumber down the highway, there is a stark emptiness in the air. You feel the vastness of the country, the sense of the unknown, the sense of adventure.

Mexican folk art is everywhere—primitive, colorful, somber murals from Juana O'Gorman to Diego Rivera, murals in movie houses, orphanages, schools, and public areas. Pseudo-revolutionary students being cut down. Sunday-loyal students sitting in corners, studying, studying, studying. The archetypical Mexican pueblo is a place of mystery and beauty. The people are rich. They are the constant desire to get the next day.

In the country, the gals are beautiful, the men are strong. The children are happy, the elderly are content. The government is weak. The people are independent. The country is full of promise.

In Mexico City, the scene is constantly changing. It is depressing to see how this beautiful, ancient country is being ravaged by modernization and greed. The city is crowded, chaotic, and dirty. The people are poor, the streets are dirty, the air is polluted. Mexico can be found only by seeking the real Mexico, the one that exists between the lines.

THE RED FLAG

The following is part two of Carol French's column published in the student newspaper. Part one appeared last week. It was submitted for publication by 9 a.m. Thursday, April 14.

The Right Way
by Robert Grinnell

Some day, Chaim, or Selena, these are the choices offered in the most important elections or referenda or opinion polls, or whatever one chooses to call it. While the choices have been tiresome, it is time to take a hard look at the results and decide whether they are acceptable or not.

If the "closed" category emerges the most support, absolutely no intercourse must proceed. Such a decision would be final. Those who do not wish to sit out this opportunity do not have the choice. They do not have the choice, but they have the right to participate in the decision. If these three points deep rather than of a "closed" category, few people will be satisfied with the results.

In the meantime, making one's own decision, "Let me tell you about myself," or "Let me tell you about my friends," or "Let me tell you about my parents," or any other opening statement, must be considered. But the opening statement must be considered in the context of the question "Do I wish to put the rest of my life into an opening statement or into a discussion of a specific issue?"

So to inform you about the issues which I have been considering, there are three questions: Whether the discussion of the issues should be limited in any way, or the discussion should be open, or whether the discussion should be limited to specific issues. I suggest that the discussion should be limited to specific issues. The discussion should be limited in any way, or the discussion should be open, or whether the discussion should be limited to specific issues. I suggest that the discussion should be limited to specific issues.

Therefore, whether the discussion of the issues should be limited in any way, or the discussion should be open, or whether the discussion should be limited to specific issues. I suggest that the discussion should be limited to specific issues.

Finally, the discussion of the issues should be limited to specific issues. I suggest that the discussion should be limited to specific issues.
