They won't help you catch rivets —

They won't cause any ill or cure any ailments

—but they Satisfy

when anything satisfies it's got to be right ..., no "life" or "busts" about it.

Cheerfield's satisfy because, first of all, they're made of the right kind of mild ripe tobaccos. These tobaccos are thoroughly aged and then blended and coarsened.

It takes time and it takes money, but whatever it costs in time or money we do it in order to give you a cigarette that's milder, a cigarette that tastes better.

"WHAT PRICE COURTESY?"

Judy evening found no place to park her car, having taken the liberty of parking in front of the dormitory. The students were returning from the ballroom to their rooms, and the car was surrounded by a sea of people. Judy, a sophomore, was determined to reach her room before the masses arrived, and she made her way through the throngs of students. Suddenly, she collided with a young man, knocking him off balance. She apologized profusely, but he seemed unimpressed.

"You could have asked me to move," he said, sounding exasperated.

Judy blushed and frowned. "But I didn't know you were there," she explained, her voice a little high-pitched from her embarrassment.

The young man, who introduced himself as John, rolled his eyes. "People walk around here all the time. It's not like you found a deserted ghost in the middle of the street."

Judy opened her mouth to protest, but John cut her off. "I'm not judging you. I just want to say that sometimes we get so busy with our own lives that we forget to be considerate of others."

Judy nodded, feeling a pang of guilt. "I know, I should have been more aware of my surroundings."

John smiled, albeit a little wanly. "It's okay. It happens to all of us. But next time, try to be more aware of the people around you."

Judy thanked him and continued on her way, feeling a little lighter. She realized that John was right: she had been too caught up in her own thoughts to notice who was beside her. Maybe she could be more like John, more aware of her surroundings and the people in it. She decided to make an effort to be more considerate in the future.

Next week, Judy was glad to report that she had indeed made an effort to be more considerate. She had even started a conversation with John, finding him to be quite an interesting person. Judy had a feeling that she was about to become quite fond of him.
