Quick Registration Questioned

The last month has been a period of general registration in many Southern States. After the recent pressures exerted by the Federal government, many states are making an all-out effort to increase the voter registration among those who had not been able to vote before due to discrimination.

While in most areas the mission was done with most honourable intentions, some of the suspected tactics in one Southern city deserve to be reviewed.

The literacy test has been so restricted that it can no longer serve as a weapon against future voters. In this particular city, the decision of which a candidate for registration was literally left to the discretion of the registrar appointed by the Board of Election in the County. Some of the registrars "prompted" the candidate's type which was formed "the big weapon" in this case, the procedure becoming considerable.

In at least one case, a candidate was only required to sign his name among several. The question might well be raised, "How many of the newly registered votes are really eligible?"

The justification for this lightening of the requirement has been limited to a condensation of the Southern school system followed by the query "What else can we do to facilitate the demobilization and responsible legislation in the South?"

It must be pointed out that giving the vote to those citizens who are incapable of reading more than a few words is asking for trouble. We can see no reason for supporting the Athens and Arts Council, on the fundamental trouble.

The Dramatics and Arts Council, on the other hand, should be the subject of a thorough investigation. Last year and this, the fourth year as now, if the entire affair were planned and printed (as the ASP, we are sure of the ASP's intentions), the ASP, we are sure of the ASP's intentions.

This conclusion is that the Campus Viewpoint does not deserve a budget. The editor has made no effort to limit the number of students to the costs of the publication.

Group Canvasses Raleigh in Voter Registration Drive

Albany student press, FRIDAY, APRIL 24, 1964

by Claudia George

Seven State students, including this writer, and three chaperones, spent one week in Raleigh, North Carolina, in a drive to register Negro voters.

The six students, Sharon Chessler '64, Maury Johnson '65, Clay Kotalik '64, Margie Kovalik '65, Robert Hagensen '65, and Margi Jolom '64, and chaperones, Mrs. Daniel Delahew and Mrs. John Snow, were in Raleigh from March 28 to April 4.

The immediate purpose of the project was to work with the Raleigh Student Movement (RSM), to register Negro babies for the primary election in May.

The project was carried out by the National Student YWCA in several Southern cities. In Raleigh we worked with the Raleigh Citizens' Movement.

The project was done in two different aspects: working with the Raleigh Community Relations Office (RCRO), and with the Raleigh Community Relations Office.

State College's Transition: Period of Mixed Thoughts, Emotions ...

State College...

In the opening week of this academic year, the newspaper initiated a series of articles dealing with the rapid growth and the moving present of our university.

It called itself "State College in Transition," a phrase short at the time and meaningful for the series. But, in the brief span of only seven months, the term "transition" has lost its original meaning and stated to the point where it leaves an apologetic taste in the mouth of any who look closely.

As we close our thumb-through book of State College History we would like to review briefly for what this word, this concept of "transition," has meant to our institution of higher education.

Basically, it has meant change, a flux, from old to new; from that of the past to that of the present and, more significantly, of the future. This, however, has not necessarily been a shift from bad to good, or poor to new; from that of the past to that of the present and, beyond all, from the confines of the future.

Transition has meant change; it has brought confusion and turmoil; it has, at times, locked communication and planning; it has often meant despair and discontent; it has at other times evoked a sense of pride and accomplishment, but above and beyond all this it has meant a challenge -- a challenge to change, to take a firm grip on the experiences and opportunities of the future.

The school will always be in a constant state of transition, the revolution, but the terms "transition" will, in a few years, have been left in the dust of the university. The institution's future is in the hands of those who plan to remain only with those of us who have been a part of this compelling challenge.

For a director, cast and crew, a rehearsal is a great deal of dedication and hard work. To someone new to the theater, it's almost magic. With Rath at the medicine, one easily gets caught up in this magic. Day after day, hours and pieces of human have been hammered and nailed into place. Disconnected and confused, the pieces may not fit together but a great raft is rising in the center of Page Hall stage. The raft, which appears to be suspended in space, is huge enough for thirteen years to understand it with so little trouble. It is awesome in its size and structure and seems to be making a statement.

Then, too, there is something magic in the way a group of people, who for the last year, never knew each other before, come together and begin to work and perform as one with one purpose in mind to do the best job they are capable of. The cast of Rath of Medusa, under unusual circumstances: they are stranded in a raft for approximately one hour and a half.

It is something less than exciting to watch them react to each other, of course, other people's presence, yet Jim Leonard, the director, is understanding. He believes both cast and crew have learned a lot and what is going on at all times and his enthusiasm makes them eager to do what is desired.

By all indications from rehearsals, Rath of Medusa promises to be an exciting dramatic experience and a rewarding one for the members of the State University Theatre department.

The final score easily came to mean nothing on Friday night, April 24, at the Albany Country Club, where the Ulster College Golf Team defeated the Oneonta College Team 11 1/2 to 1. The match was played under Pinehaven's towering coniferous trees.

Albany agreed to cooperate with Oneonta in the conference games this spring; the final result in this match was only significant inasmuch as the Ulster team has the best of the conference.
