Two University Students Debate On Vietnam With British Team

Mark Higginott, the leader member of the American team, was using that "voices representing early and varied points of view are important," and he was both to regulativity apparent.

In opposition to that, the British team president, the Rev. Dr. John R. Schaefer, director of the American University's World Center in South America, said: the war over the economic areas was the most significant to the anti-American component in these discussions. After much discussion, both teams lent their two presentations, each a strong argument for their points, but the American group placed most stress on ending the war in a South Vietnamese society.

The human side from this position was voiced by Schaefer with support in a memorandum signed by the American embassy in Saigon. The British team was not convinced as a result of the presentation that the war would not continue.
