Sessow ...
The Presidential election draws nearer, but hot and heavy are the discussions in the halls and on the campus. Many students say they are not too concerned and have not given much thought to the election.

"I think it's a waste of time," said one student. "I don't care who is elected, I'm going to continue to vote for the same person every time." Others, however, are more interested. "I want to make sure I vote for someone who will do what's best for the country," said another student.

The major issue on the ballot this year is the economy. Many students are concerned about the high cost of living and the lack of jobs.

"I'm worried about finding a job after I graduate," said one student. "I hope the next President can do something about it." Others are more optimistic. "I think things will improve once the economy gets back on track," said another student.

The student body is divided on the issue of the war in Vietnam. Some students support the war and believe it is necessary to protect American interests abroad. Others are against the war and believe it is causing more harm than good.

"I don't think we should be in Vietnam," said one student. "The war is costing too much money and lives and we're not making any progress. I think we should pull out and come home." Others, however, are more supportive. "I think we're winning the war," said another student. "We have to keep fighting until we win."
