Budget Rules

In spring, a State student's fancy turns to the budget, much as does the seed of a flower sprouting in the sun. Each year, the budget committee meets to discuss the fiscal year to come.

In discussing the budget, many facets must be taken into consideration. First, open budget hearings are held for each organization. The budget for Student Council is the place to any major gripe and is held by the Student Assembly. Granted, this is not the place to voice a grievance against the 2nd baseman, but it is the place to present a case to the spending budget. Gripes that were not anticipated, but for instance, such as a karaoke machine that would help entertain the dormitory at night, could be presented to these organizations.

Second, boards of organizations are not out to exhaust funds or gain votes from the Student Assembly. Arranging a budget is no easy task, nor is it an easy task to run an organization with the threat of bankruptcy hanging over your head all year.

These budgets were well thought out beforehand and executed thoroughly to Student Board of Finance. Members of the organization will be notified by the Student Board Finance of some matters which may or may not concern them. They are not in anyway to defend these organizations.

Third, the extra curricular program of this college cannot be run without sufficient funds. As things stand now, the surplus budget is not adequate to meet the needs of the programs. If the surplus budget was to be used for general expenses, the programs would suffer.

Considering the budgets of several thousand dollars under which we have worked in the past, this is an insignificant amount. Top of this, when it is realized that our budget for next year will be $500 below the budget of the last year, the tendency for students to find fault is understandable.

If we want a decent program in this college, one which we can be proud of, we have to increase the standards of the programs. The programs can not be sustained with a mere $500.

What Happened

Do you want to get a job? Then listen! I'll take you step by step through the process. First you must wait for the phone to ring. Then listen carefully. When you hear an offer—"We're interested in you!"—then you may think you have found the job for you. But don't be fooled, this may only be the beginning of the process. First you must walk across this line and say "Thank you." You don't want to offend them, but you must also be careful not to offend them.

You are now on your way to the next step. You must then fill out an application form. It is important that you fill out all the blanks, not just the ones that are required. The employer may ask for additional information about your experience and education. It is important to include all relevant information.

You must then attend an interview. This is a crucial step in the process. You should be prepared to answer questions about your qualifications, experience, and abilities. It is important to be honest and to be able to provide concrete examples of your skills and accomplishments.

You must then wait for a response. This can be a long and frustrating process. It is important to be patient and to continue to follow up on your application. You may need to call the company to check on the status of your application.

You must then accept or reject the offer. If you accept the offer, you must then sign the employment contract. If you reject the offer, you must then move on to the next step of the process.

Note: If you are offered a job, you must not accept it without first checking with your school counselor or your college's placement office. It is important to make sure that the job is a good fit for your career objectives and that it will help you achieve your long-term goals.

Supreme Court Religious Rule Causes Controversy In Systems

The decision of the Supreme Court will undoubtedly affect the religious practices of public schools across the United States. In a recent ruling, the Court has overturned the constitutionality of a federal religious instruction program, effectively placing the burden of religious instruction on the shoulders of individual states. This decision has sparked a heated debate among educators, religious leaders, and politicians, with many expressing concern over the potential impact on educational freedom and religious expression. However, others welcome the decision as a step towards promoting the separation of church and state in public education.

The implications of this decision are far-reaching, and it is likely that we will see a continued struggle over the role of religion in public schools. The debate will undoubtedly continue as states and school boards navigate the new landscape of religious instruction.
