Lesser of Two Evils

March 12th

Dear Editor,

High Carey, did you ask the Arkansas Times what the state is and what you are for? As of today, the faculty—your faculty—have not voted to set aside $25,000 for your election campaign. We feel that it is time for a change. We feel that you are not qualified for a leadership post. We feel that you are in no way prepared to handle the responsibilities that lie ahead. We feel that you are not the man for the job. We feel that you are not the man for the position you seek.

Sincerely yours,

Your students

Doris deep at University and she was happy to make arrangements. She was almost there and her appetite was already making itself known. She knew she had a bit of time before her flight, so she decided to stop by the bookstore and pick up a new novel. As she walked down the aisle, she noticed a man with a familiar face. It was her old high school sweetheart, who had moved to New York just after graduation. They had been in touch occasionally, but Doris knew she hadn't seen him in years. She hesitated for a moment, but then decided to approach him.

"Hi, it's been a long time," she said, trying to sound as casual as possible.

"Yeah, it has," he replied, looking a bit surprised. "What brings you to New York?"

"I'm just passing through. So, how have you been?"

He smiled and said, "I've been doing pretty well. You know how it goes in the big city."

Doris nodded and said, "Yeah, pretty much. How about you?"

He hesitated for a moment, then said, "I've been working in finance. It's been good, but not as exciting as I thought it would be."

Doris smiled and said, "Well, at least you have a steady job. I hope you're enjoying yourself."

He nodded and said, "Yeah, it's pretty decent. What about you?"

Doris shook her head and said, "I'm just passing through. I have to catch a flight soon."

He looked at her, then said, "Well, see you around."

Doris smiled and said, "Yeah, maybe we can catch up later."

"Definitely," he said, and they parted ways. As she walked down the aisle, she felt a pang of regret. She knew she should have stayed in touch with him, but life had kept them apart. She sighed and continued on her way, hoping for a chance to talk to him again someday. But for now, she had a flight to catch.

It was as if I was to wipe the excess stain off the furniture. I didn't feel as if I could do this task without the proper amount of preparation. The work itself was tedious but rewarding. I'd sit on the makeshift benches in the factory and ponder the day's events. I needed a time to reflect on things. Besides, we were paid hourly, which meant a strike. A mood of excitement would be pretty much the same within a short time after my lay off. The machinery was brought back to life. I'd go to sleep before the spray gun would hiss. That was all over the floor. Worst of all, the odor of the dye would permeate the air. I'd lose my sense of smell.

I'd feel a strange sensation in my stomach as I'd begin to wipe the excess stain off the furniture. I knew by the time the clock hit 7:00, I'd be totally covered with the stuff.

I was just 16 when I took advantage of any opportunity to make some money. I helped my father with the family business and eventually became a principal stockholder. Located on a winding street, the factory was low. It was a sight for sore eyes. The full view was enclosed in a metal cage. The walls were covered in brown stain. If the other two stainers finish their work, I can start on the next job. The going is slow (remember that two hours are to be paid for each hour of work performed). The philosophy, according to Kidder, is that the benefits of the game are equal for all. At least two at lunch. He tried to quit smoking.
