Compulsory Assemblies?

Compulsory assemblies have long been a subject of controversy. While some believe in their importance, others argue against them. The main arguments against compulsory assemblies are that they are a waste of time and that they do not provide students with the opportunity to participate in meaningful discussions. On the other hand, supporters argue that compulsory assemblies are necessary for the smooth functioning of the school and for the dissemination of important information.

There are also arguments for and against the idea of non-compulsory assemblies. Proponents argue that non-compulsory assemblies allow students to choose which ones they want to attend, thus increasing their engagement. Opponents argue that non-compulsory assemblies may lead to a lack of participation and that the school may not have the opportunity to disseminate important information.

The debate continues, with both sides presenting valid arguments. Ultimately, the decision on whether to make assemblies compulsory or non-compulsory will depend on the individual school and its unique circumstances.
