Late Rally Carries Stickmen to Victory

A last-minute three-point goal by Terry Walsh gave Plattsburgh the lead with 2:02 remaining in the game and fended off the Colgate Danes, 8-6, in Sunday's Eastern Intercollegiate Lacrosse Association game at the Carrier Dome in Syracuse.

Late Rally Carries Stickmen to Victory

With 1:38 left, the teams were tied at 6, 6, as the Colgate Danes had fought back from a 2-0 first-quarter deficit to tie the game in the third period. Plattsburgh coach Bob Munsey called a timeout with 1:28 left to give his team some extra time to regroup.

After the timeout, the Stickmen went on to defeat Colgate, 8-6, and advance to the next round of the playoffs. The win also marked the beginning of the end of the Danes' season, as they were eliminated from playoff contention.

In his post-game interview, Munsey praised his team's performance and their ability to come back from a 2-0 deficit. He also thanked his players for their hard work and dedication, saying that it was their efforts that got them to this point.

Overall, it was a great game for both teams, with Plattsburgh demonstrating their ability to come back from behind and Colgate showing their resilience in battling back to tie the game. The final score was 8-6 in favor of Plattsburgh, but both teams can be proud of their performances.

Subjekt Remains Numb as He is Acupuncture Struck

by Bertha Swartout

The story of Eric Wilson, a young student at the Brooklyn College of Medicine, who died last week after undergoing twenty minutes of acupuncture treatment, is a warning to all who believe in the efficacy of traditional Chinese medical practices.

The patient, a 24-year-old man with a history of asthma and allergic reactions, had been referred to Dr. Lewis, a specialist in acupuncture, by his family doctor. The treatment was to alleviate his symptoms, which had worsened in recent weeks.

During the treatment, Dr. Lewis administered a series of needles to the patient's body, including the face and hands. The patient reported feeling numbness and tingling in his legs and arms.

Within twenty minutes, the patient complained of intense pain and began to convulse. Dr. Lewis attempted to remove the needles, but the patient died shortly afterward.

The death is under investigation by the Medical Examiner's Office and the New York State Department of Health. The cause of death is believed to be related to the acupuncture treatment.

The incident has raised questions about the safety of acupuncture and the need for further research into its effectiveness. It also highlights the importance of informed consent and the need for adequate training for practitioners.

As for the Brooklyn College of Medicine, the school has issued a statement expressing condolences to the patient's family and expressing its commitment to the health and safety of its students.

The school has also launched an investigation into the incident and has暂停了所有相关的治疗项目。

Tommy's Rebirth: See it...

by Alan D. Abbey

Director Ken Russell has taken The Who's eight-year-old rock opera, Tommy, and turned it into a musical. The result is a new, more cohesive film, incorporating many of the original songs and some new ones, performed by various artists.

The film opens with an extended sequence in a large, futuristic city, where we see a group of young people dancing and singing. This is followed by a scene in a small village, where we see the main character, Tommy, growing up as a troubled youth.

The film continues with Tommy's journey through life, encountering various challenges and obstacles. He meets a series of characters, including a prostitute, a street urchin, and a wise old man, who guide him on his path.

The film's climax occurs when Tommy finally reaches the city again, where he encounters a group of people singing and dancing. This leads to a celebration of life and happiness.

The film ends with Tommy looking back on his journey, realizing that he has grown and changed. He says goodbye to the people of the city and leaves, knowing that he has found his place in the world.

There's a long tradition of rock bands filling in the middle of the sound with powerful, driving rhythms and songs, and the Who have always been masters of this craft. "Pinball Wizard" is a prime example of their ability to create a driving, rhythmic sound that keeps the audience on the edge of their seats.

The Who's style is characterized by a strong sense of dynamics, with dramatic shifts in tempo and volume. This helps to create a sense of tension and release, which is a hallmark of their music. The band's musicianship is also top-notch, with each member contributing their own unique style and sound to the overall ensemble.

A Longing for Freedom

By J. Edward Richardson

As far back as 1902, lead (actually tetraethyl lead) had been added to gasoline to facilitate the chemical reaction in the car's engine. This was done to increase the octane rating of the gasoline, thus making it easier to start and run the engines. Lead was also used as a stabilizer for the gasoline, preventing it from breaking down and forming harmful gases. However, the use of lead in gasoline had a serious impact on the environment. Lead emissions from vehicles were a major source of lead pollution in the atmosphere, leading to health problems for humans and animals and to environmental damage.

The hazards of lead in the atmosphere had been known for some time. As far back as the 1920s, lead toxicity was a problem in some industrial areas. People who worked in these areas were exposed to high levels of lead, leading to health problems. However, it was not until the 1940s and 1950s that the full extent of lead pollution became known. The problem was most severe in urban areas, where the air was polluted with lead from vehicle exhaust.

The problem of lead pollution was not limited to the United States. Lead pollution was a problem in many countries around the world. In Europe, for example, lead pollution was a problem in many cities, leading to health problems for the residents.

As the problem of lead pollution became more severe, efforts were made to reduce it. In the 1970s and 1980s, many countries, including the United States, began to regulate the use of lead in gasoline. In 1975, the United States began to phase out lead in gasoline, and by 1995, all gasoline in the United States was lead-free.

The elimination of lead from gasoline had a significant impact on the environment. The reduction of lead emissions from vehicles led to a significant reduction in lead pollution in the atmosphere. The reduction of lead pollution had a positive impact on human health, as lead is a known neurotoxin and can cause serious health problems for children and adults.

The elimination of lead from gasoline was a victory for the environmental movement. It showed that with political will and public pressure, it was possible to make significant changes to protect the environment and public health.

The story of lead pollution and its elimination is a reminder of the importance of持续关注 and持续努力 in protecting the environment.
