False Motivation . . .

Is an "A" student truly a better student than a "B" student? The answer to this question has been debated for years. It is often assumed that the "A" student is necessarily the better student. However, research has shown that this assumption is not always valid. Some students who receive lower grades may be motivated by factors such as personal or family circumstances, while some students who receive higher grades may be motivated by factors such as external pressures or social expectations.

In order to determine whether a student is truly motivated, it is important to consider the student's own perspective. Students should be encouraged to reflect on their own motivations and to articulate their goals and aspirations. By doing so, students can develop a more accurate understanding of their own motivations and can make more informed decisions about their future academic pursuits.

Focus On Faculty

By MADIVA RHEA

Dr. Wallace has always been a favorite professor of mine. He has taught me not only about literature, but also about life. His teaching style is engaging and his lectures are always interesting. I have learned so much from him and I am grateful for his guidance.

Common Stater

When you enter a classroom, you expect to learn something new. However, sometimes the material presented is so dry and uninteresting that it becomes difficult to stay focused. This is especially true when the teacher is not engaging or when the lecture is not relevant to the students' lives.

It is important for teachers to create an environment that is conducive to learning. This can be done by incorporating interactive elements into the lecture, such as questions, discussions, or group activities. It is also important to make the material relevant to the students' lives by connecting it to real-world examples or by relating it to their own experiences.
