To the Editor:

Dear Reader,

The issue of free expression has always been a glory of American democracy. However, in recent times, there has been a debate about whether our education system should teach students to be open minded and accept different viewpoints or whether they should be taught to critically evaluate the ideas they encounter. This debate has been dispersed across various platforms, with colleges and universities at the center of the controversy.

There are those who argue that free speech should be unrestricted and that it is the duty of each individual to form their own opinions independently of others. They believe that free speech is essential to a democratic society and that it allows for the exchange of ideas and the democratic process. They argue that restricting speech would lead to a censorship of ideas and the suppression of free expression.

On the other hand, there are those who believe that it is important to have some kind of freedom of expression in order to protect people from propaganda and hate speech.
They argue that inappropriate or offensive speech should be restricted in order not to harm others or promote division amongst groups.

However, the debate is not just about the right to free speech, but also about how we choose to exercise it. There is a need to understand that free speech comes with responsibilities and that we should acknowledge the impact of our words and actions on others.

In conclusion, the debate over free speech and its limits continues to be an important issue. It requires us to engage in meaningful conversations and to reflect on our actions and the consequences of our words.

Sincerely,
