The Soggy of Western Wash...never identical, but always in the same small, confined drama of wet versus dry. Like television, endings week a man was idling in a corner drug store on a rainy day and gazing at the assortment of wet and dry garments that hung on the walls. He was a member of a fraternity and was looking for something new to wear the next weekend. He had heard about the new laundromat that had opened across from Albany High School.

The laundromat, located across from Albany High at 123 Main Street, was a fascinating place. It was maintained by a wealthy seventy-year-old woman who had inherited a fortune from her father. The woman was a recluse and rarely came out of her house. She had a large collection of portraits of Lucie Stein, the Gertrude Stein of wash artists. She told of the laundromat's history and how it was started by her grandfather, who had been a laundry man in New York City.

The laundromat was open twenty-four hours a day, and the woman would come in every once in a while to check on the machines. She would sit in a small room, reading the first in a series of "do-not-touch" signs that adorned the walls. She would sip her tea and watch the people come and go, marveling at the variety of people who used the laundromat. She would laugh her way out and back into the Incubator and await rebirth of innocence.

The laundromat was a place of refuge for many sordid characters who hung around. It was a place where they could feel safe and be themselves. The woman who ran the laundromat provided them with a place to dry their clothes and sheets but generally carried the story of their lives with them.

The woman was a member of the Roosevelt Club and was known for her intellectual conversation. He dwelled on her musical ability and her awkwardness, with the two slender beings. He was fascinated by her rebellion of mommy, daddy, and Charlie Brown. One enters upon a well-traveled establishment by the plagiarized portraits of Lucie Stein. She also started the Roosevelt Club and was known for her intellectual conversation.

Peds End Season with LeMoyne; Robinson, Tuttle to Run Last Race

When Albany State's "unbeatable" horserace meets LeMoyne College and New Palisades State this afternoon, it will be the last appearance of the Kirt's top two runners, Tony Robinson and Dennis Tuttle. State's unassailable dual meet record will also be in the balance as LeMoyne will attempt to repeat the performance last season. The Peds have won most eight-straight dual meets this year, and fifteen straight over a two-year span. The last State loss was in November, 1962.
